It was going to be a beautiful day! Brian decided to wander into the village and have breakfast at the pretty cafe by the harbour masters cottage. The smell of freshly made coffee and pastries met his nostrils as he stepped through the open door. He glanced around the room and recognised some of the faces of the locals he had met in the village pub the previous evening. The weather beaten faces of the fishermen broke into broad smiles as they saw him. He looked around the and it's friendly hard working people. George had often talked with Brian about some of his pupils, who were now retired themselves. He had also taught their children and was familiar with as many as four generations of the same family. He was always amazed at his good fortune to have ended up in this village and to have lived so long. He cherished every day and was content with his lot. Brian ordered fresh cups of coffee for both of them and George folded up his newspaper with it's half finished cross word. George was a bright and alert man despite his great age and although his old joints creaked a little, he still played an active part in village society. He was warmly regarded by all who knew him and was seen as a fountain of knowledge. Everyone wanted George in their team whenever there was a quiz night at the pub or village hall. Brian was no exception and had fond memories of being on the winning team with free drinks for the rest of the evening. Brian had on a number of occasions, used George to settle arguments and wagers with the locals about historical facts. His mind was a cornucopia of information and a deep depository of hilarious anecdotes. Who needed the internet?
